Phoenix Goes Hollywood:

Phoenix Art Museum Presents West Coast premiere of London’s Hollywood Costume

Victoria and Albert Museum exhibit features more than 75 iconic film costumes, March 26 – July 6, 2014

PHOENIX (September 1, 2013) – Phoenix Art Museum will present the Western U.S. premiere of Hollywood Costume, a major, multimedia exhibition featuring more than 75 costumes from a century of filmmaking, many of which have never been displayed outside the walls of secured studio archives and private collections. This ticketed exhibition, organized by London’s Victoria and Albert Museum (V&A), will open in Phoenix on March 26, 2014, on view through July 6.

“It is an honor for Phoenix Art Museum to present Hollywood Costume, which uniquely explores the pivotal role that costume plays in cinematic storytelling, the ways in which an actor’s dress influences the character he or she becomes,” said James K. Ballinger, the Museum’s Sybil Harrington Director. “It is so much more than a collection of costumes. It is a collection of the sparks that ignite the stories we love.”

The exhibition offers the once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to see an astonishing array of some of the most recognizable costumes from films that have profoundly shaped American culture in the last 100 years. It includes some of the most famous costumes in film history, such as Dorothy’s blue-and-white gingham dress from The Wizard of Oz (Adrian), Indiana Jones’ slouchy leather jacket from Raiders of the Lost Ark (Deborah Nadoolman Landis), and the infamous billowing white ‘subway’ dress of Marilyn Monroe in The Seven Year Itch (William Travilla).

Alongside contemporary films such as Harry Potter and the Half-Blood Prince (Jany Temime), Gladiator (Jany Yates), Titanic (Deborah L. Scott), Superman IV: The Quest for Peace (John Bloomfield), and Dreamgirls (Sharen Davis), some of the most unexpected treasures of Hollywood Costume will be the opportunity for visitors to see ensembles that have been immortalized only in black-and-white films such as Hedy Lamarr’s peacock-inspired dress in Samson and Delilah (Edith Head, 1949) in full color, forever changing the viewer’s perspective of these memorable costumes.

“Many would find it surprising to learn that there was not even an Oscar for Costume Design until 1948,” explains Dennita Sewell, Curator of Fashion Design at Phoenix Art Museum. “Hollywood Costume truly examines, for the first time, the weight and importance of the costume designers’ contributions to the development of a story, and the creation of a world unto itself.” Beyond a display of rarely-seen costumes, the exhibition illuminates the designer’s creative process from script to screen, and the collaborative dialogue between designer, director and actor, blending multimedia elements and integrating technology such as video interviews that examine the ways in which costume enriches character and story, resulting in a meaningful and memorable film experience.
The exhibition will explore the role of costume in storytelling through a progression of three acts or themes, all of which include a historical journey beginning as early as the era of silent film and as recent as the world of motion-capture suits used in films such as Avatar. It moves through more elaborate, glamorous confections such as Vanessa Redgrave’s embellished ivory dress as Guinevere in Camelot (John Truscott), to the subtle, seemingly plain-clothes ensemble of Javier Bardem’s turn as Anton in No Country for Old Men (Mary Zophres).

Phoenician Art Museum is only the second location in the United States to present Hollywood Costume, and is the first premièr of the show West of the Mississippi. It has been exhibited at the Australian Centre for the Moving Image in Melbourne (through August 18), and will appear at the Virginia Museum of Fine Arts in Richmond (November 9 – February 17). It is organized by the V&A in London, and was curated by renowned costume designer Deborah Nadoolman Landis (Raiders of the Lost Ark, Coming to America), Sir Christopher Frayling (Professor Emeritus of Cultural History, Royal College of Art), and set and costume designer and V&A Assistant Curator, Keith Lodwick. The exhibition has been designed by Casson Mann of London.

Hollywood Costume at Phoenix Art Museum
The Phoenix premiere is curated by Dennita Sewell (Curator of Fashion Design, Phoenix Art Museum), and has been made possible through the generous support of presenting sponsors Molina Fine Jewelers, Black, Starr & Frost, J.P. Morgan, and Chase. Additional support has been provided by APS and Joan Cremin. Hollywood Costume is on view March 26 – July 6, 2014. The exhibition will be on view Tuesday, Noon-5pm; Wednesday, Noon-8:30 pm; Thursday, Noon-5pm; Friday, 10am-8:30pm; Saturdays and Sundays, 10am – 5pm. This specially ticketed exhibition is offered at an admission price of $20 for adults and $10 for children aged 6-17, which includes general admission to the Museum. Children under 6 are admitted free. Advanced gift vouchers will be on-sale beginning November 1, 2013. Individual ticket sales will begin January 13, 2014. Large group reservations are available now.

Exhibition Structure
Hollywood Costume is divided into three acts that together tell the story of costume design and its impact on storytelling.

Act One: Deconstruction introduces the role of the costume designer in cinema. It explores the link between clothing and identity, and the creative process in which designers flesh out and bring to life a character from the pages of a script. It includes both elaborate period costumes as well as modern ensembles. It will include costumes from films such as The Last Emperor (James Acheson), Brokeback Mountain (Marit Allen), Fight Club (Michael Kaplan), and Elizabeth: The Golden Age (Alexandra Byrne).

Act Two: Dialogue follows the creative collaboration between filmmakers, actors and designers. Using archival film footage as well as specially commissioned interviews, Act Two explores the director/designer pairings of Alfred Hitchcock and Edith Head (The Birds), Tim Burton and Colleen Atwood (Edward Scissorhands), and Martin Scorsese and Sandy Powell (Gangs of New York). This section also explores the ways in which designers have responded to advances in technology and animation, as well as industry change and evolving social mores. This act also includes “The Art of Becoming,” a deeper examination into the costumes and roles throughout the illustrious careers of celebrated actors, Robert DeNiro and Meryl Streep.

Act Three: Finale features the most recognizable and beloved costumes in cinema history, from the heroes of screen to the smoldering femme fatales who have captured the world’s imagination for decades, such as Marilyn Monroe’s white dress in The Seven Year Itch, or Keira Knightley’s green silk gown in Atonement (Jacqueline Durran). It will also include works that stir childhood memories and the unending struggle of good versus evil such as the Batman suit of The Dark Knight Rises (Lindy Hemming), the Gryffindor uniform of Harry Potter and the Half-Blood Prince, and, perhaps most famous of all, Dorothy’s blue-and-white gingham pinafore from The Wizard of Oz. The finale explores the most memorable costumes of Hollywood history, the iconic images that linger in our imaginations and hearts, long after the credits have rolled and the film has flickered to a close, the theatre dark.
